

Dear Tim,

Many congratulations...

I am sure you know that story of how the National WWII Museum got started with Steven Ambrose telling Nick Mueller that he wanted to start a D Day museum to house all the artifacts he'd collected during his time researching his many books.

And now look what they have there. Perhaps your place in South Kingstown is just getting started? A treasure trove of critically important history.

God bless you for documenting so much over the years as you have.

All the best to you.

Your pal,

Gary Sinise

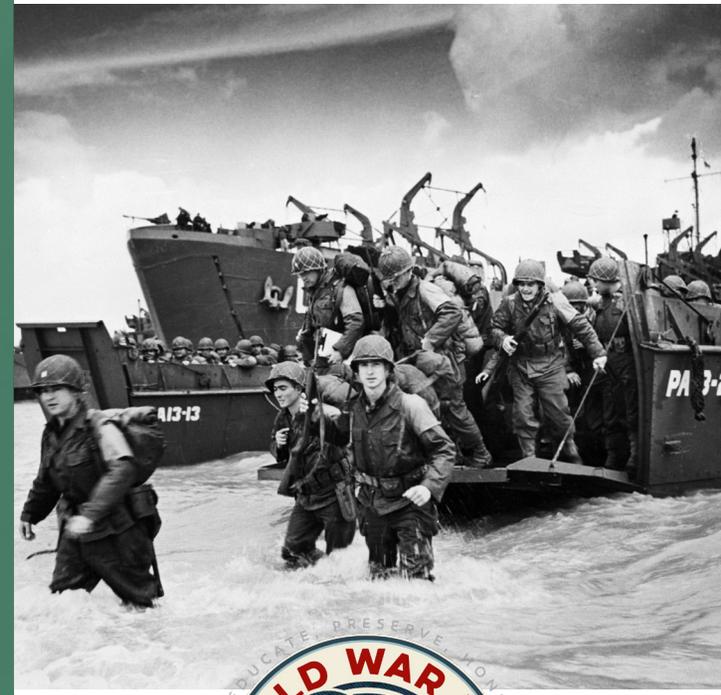

For hours, please visit:
www.wwiifoundation.org/virtual-visit/

The World War II Foundation
Global Education Center
344 Main Street
Suite 101
South Kingstown, RI 02879
401-862-3030

THE WWII FOUNDATION MUSEUM

"The most comprehensive World War II collection on display anywhere in the country."

-Ken Rendell, World War II Historian and Author

THE WWII FOUNDATION MUSEUM

The World War II Foundation Global Education Center welcomes school groups, educators, researchers and the public from around the United States to share with them, especially the students, an overview of the personal stories of the WWII generation.

The education center is very interactive and focused on preserving these stories so that future generations don't forget the sacrifices of all those who served in and survived WWII. It will also impart the hard lessons of war and its cost to society.

The center's curriculum is built upon the 30 films the WWII Foundation has produced to date for a global television audience, as well as the artifacts of WWII, more than 500 books which chronicle the stories of that generation and a small theater, seating 35 people, which is a central part of the education center's visual learning component. The learning center does not glorify war but focuses on the people and their personal stories during that time period.

info@wwiifoundation.org
<https://wwiifoundation.org/virtual-visit/>

